Justin Swinburne
White Room

The living being had no need of eyes when there was nothing remaining outside to be seen. The cell had no windows, and the walls and the clothes were white. The floor was composed of white plates. It was forbidden to speak and the guards reportedly used muffled shoes to prevent sound. It was denied any use of organs by the help of which it might receive its food or get rid of what it had already digested, since there was nothing which went from it or came into it: for there was nothing beside the living being.

This lonely being never leaves, long after it is judged. Every door that is closed on it— they get what they want without having to strike. And once the being breaks, they have control. Then it begins to confess in itself and as this circular movement requires no feet, the universe is created without legs and without feet. Without desire it was created thus, its own waste providing its own food, and all that it did or suffered taking place in and by itself.
